Mr. Christopher L. McDaid
Williamsburg, Virginia

*“Archeological work and Discovery on the Warwick
Line around Mulberry Island
& Fort Crafford”*

Fort Crafford anchored the James River end of the Confederate defensive line that ran across the peninsula from Yorktown to Mulberry Island. Mr. Christopher McDaid, who is the Cultural Resources Manager for the 733rd Civil Engineer Division at Fort Eustis, will give us insights and background on the property which was part of the Crafford farm, the construction of the fort which was designed to work in conjunction with Fort Huger on the opposite side of the James, and the construction of the additional land defenses to the fort in with the total Warwick line. Chris will discuss how the fort was designed and positioned to take advantage of swamps and marshes. The remains of two earthen bombproofs, the hidden 'Mulberry Point Battery, and other items of archeological interest will be discussed. The land was acquired for Fort Eustis in 1918. The War Department deemed the land historic and it remained untouched for decades. In 1974 Fort Crafford was placed on the National Register of Historic Places. The earthworks at are some of the best preserved in all of eastern Virginia.

Christopher is currently the lead archaeologist for Fort Eustis, Virginia. He will receive his doctorate from the University of Leicester's School of Archaeology and Ancient History in July, 2013. He has worked in the Archaeological Research Departments at The University of Denver, the Colonial Williamsburg Foundation & William and Mary.

Bring a guest to our March meeting. Supper will be served at 6:30 and we will introduce our speaker at 7:30. Our buffet costs $17 per person. Non members please contact Ken Parsons at 757-564-0878 for reservations. (217 Sherwood Forest, Williamsburg 23188)

CONFEDERATE GRAVESITES

(Contributed by Historian/Genealogist Compatriot Fred Boelt)

Robert Pryor Taylor was born in James City County in 1832. There were several men by this name in the county over a number of years. They were probably all descendants of Edmund Taylor and his wife Sally, who had eleven children. Edmund's oldest son, Robert Pryor Taylor, died during the War of 1812, and undoubtedly, the name was passed down through several generations.

The Robert Pryor Taylor of this study was the son of R. P. and Mary A. Taylor. The father died sometime between the 1840 and 1850 censuses. Living in Williamsburg, Mary Taylor was head of household in 1850. Son Robert was listed as a clerk. His older sister Catherine M. and younger brother William M. were also in the household.

About 1858 or 1859, Robert Taylor married Sarah Harwood Pettis. Born in 1834 in York County, Sarah, known as Sallie, was the daughter of Elizabeth Harwood Semple and her second husband, Rev. Madison Pettis. Elizabeth had been raised by her uncle Judge James Semple of New Kent and had inherited a sizeable estate from him. She had five children with the reverend before he abandoned the family and settled in Orange County. In a letter to a cousin written in 1851, Elizabeth indicated that she had sacrificed to give her children educations. Sallie was being trained to be a teacher at that time.

In 1860, Robert was the Steward at the Eastern Lunatic Asylum, and he and Sallie had a four month old son, another Robert Pryor Taylor. His mother Mary Taylor was also living with them. On April 28, 1861, in Williamsburg, Robert enlisted as a private in Company C, 32nd Virginia Infantry. He was listed as 1st Sergeant on February 28, 1862, a brevetted 2nd Lieutenant on May 1st, and was promoted to 2nd Lieutenant on January 29, 1863. Taylor's service records include several requisitions from the Quarter Master for supplies for his men. In addition to the regular clothing and ammunition requests, he also asked for paper, envelopes, pens and ink. Though these supplies became scarce as the war dragged on, they were morale-boosters for the men.

Robert Taylor was present on all rolls with the exception of being out due to illness for several short periods. He also was granted a forty day furlough beginning on December 22, 1862. Additionally, he had shorter leaves granted in January of 1864 and 1865. The application for leave in 1864 specified "to visit family in Orange County." His wife's father, Madison Pettis had settled there in the 1840s. It is possible that Robert's family had refugeed there at some point to get out of Williamsburg. Robert Taylor was paroled at Appomattox on April 9, 1865.

In addition to Robert and Sallie's first son, Robert, they had three more children: Carleton, born November 18, 1862; Mary Elizabeth, born about 1864; and Sallie Semple, born on September 18, 1867. The exact date and cause are not known, but Robert Pryor Taylor died in 1867 and was buried in Cedar Grove Cemetery. In 1870, Sallie was head of household and her four children and her mother, Elizabeth Pettis, were living with her in Williamsburg. Sallie was a "retail grocer" at the time and was a "dry goods merchant" in 1880.

There is a relatively new looking granite shaft marking the graves of Robert, his wife Sallie, who died in 1920; and three of their children: Carleton, who died in 1884; Robert Pryor, Jr., who died in 1889; and Sallie Semple Taylor, who died in 1948. Small crossed Confederate flags are engraved at the top of this monument. Daughter Mary Elizabeth is not included. Perhaps she married and had descendants who may have placed this marker.

HONORING THE CONFEDERATE DEAD AT HISTORIC ST. JOHN'S CHURCH

By Mark St. John Erickson of The Daily Press, March 19th 2013

Cecil W. Thomas III strides down an old brick walk outside historic St. John's Church, scanning its ancient cemetery left and right for the tell-tale signs of Civil War soldiers.

Hundreds and hundreds of tombstones and monuments rise from the earth as he walks. But what he's searching for much closer to the ground are the low gray forms of Confederate memorial crosses.

Singly and in clusters as large as six and seven, these cast-iron markers crop up like mournful flowers here — and Thomas nods toward every one with the reverence and familiarity of someone who feels a personal attachment.

For nearly a year, he spent much of his free time alongside them on his hands and knees, wearing out a half-dozen wire brushes in a determined one-man campaign to scrape off the rust and restore every one of 166 crosses.

That's fewer than half, however, of the nearly 400 he's brushed off, primed and repainted over the past four years in a string of cemeteries that stretches from St. John's in Hampton across the James River to his old family burial ground at Mill Swamp Cemetery in Isle of Wight County.

"Most of these guys were simple, ordinary people. They believed they were fighting for their homes and their families," says Thomas, whose blood ties to the war include not only 28 kinsmen who fought for the South but also distant cousin George Henry Thomas, the Southampton County soldier whose battlefield prowess as a Union general sparked such nicknames as "The Sledge of Nashville" and "The Rock of Chickamauga."

"My great-great-grandfather John Henry Thomas was shot six times but still survived the war — and I don't want people like him to be forgotten."

Such devout acts of remembrance are one reason why the Civil War and the culture of honor and mourning it spawned continue to draw scholarly attention more than 150 years after the conflict started.

Many of the distinctive military burial rites taken for granted in the United States today reach back to that turbulent time, says historian J. Michael Cobb, who will explore the origin of these traditions in a free lunchtime program scheduled for noon today at the Hampton History Museum.

Before the Civil War, the country had no systematic way to count and identify its fallen warriors, no way to notify next of kin and no provision for the decent burials of those killed in the line of duty.

But as described by Harvard University historian Drew Gilpin Faust in her ground-breaking 2008 book — "The Republic of Suffering: Death and the American Civil War" — all that changed dramatically with the deaths of as many as 750,000 Union and Confederate soldiers.

"At the center of the war was the vast number of the killed and wounded. It was unprecedented," Cobb said, recounting losses that would be the equivalent of 6 million killed today.

"And in the South — where three in five men of military age fought and one in five died — practically everyone was touched."

Thomas learned about that impact early on, hearing story after family story about the war as a child. But not until the Chesapeake man visited the Isle of Wight graveyard of his ancestors for the first time in 1986 did he begin to grasp the full extent of its consequences for his kin.

More than a dozen of those who fought are buried at Mill Swamp, and — as the only surviving male Thomas in the region — the young man started tending their headstones and memorial crosses.

Five years later, he says, he decided to remember their sacrifice by marking their graves with small Confederate flags.

Over time, that act of family devotion expanded to include the burial places of other Southern soldiers. Soon Thomas was planting some 200 flags twice each year in a ritual that cost him hundreds of dollars.

Not long after joining the Isle of Wight camp of the Sons of Confederate Veterans in 2008, he took on the added task of restoring the soldiers' cast-iron crosses.

"Whenever I put out the flags I saw the way they looked — and it really upset me," Thomas said.

"Some of the crosses at St. John's looked like they hadn't been kept up for 50 years."

Even that diligence may not be enough, however, for a man whose reverence for the fallen now takes him as far as Old Blandford Church in Petersburg, where more than 20,000 Confederate graves inspired one of the first Memorial Day observances in 1866.

"I'm very serious about this," he says, looking out over the crosses at St. John's.

"I'm going to come back and clean off every single tombstone, too."

PROPOSED JAMES CITY CAVALRY CAMP CHARGE

"The James City Cavalry, Camp 2095, Sons of Confederate Veterans, is proud of the brave men who left their homes and families in defense of Constitutional Liberty and States Rights to face overwhelming odds. Many paid the ultimate price; all endured hardships and suffering while maintaining the reputation of the greatest fighting force the world had ever known. Placing their faith in God, the Southern Soldiers fought for a just cause and the light of their accomplishments can never be dimmed or shadowed by any revision of history."
